The best laid schemes of 'Mice and Men, Gang of eight,' in the course of the book's title, it concludes roughly like "no matter how well we may plan the future, things often go wrong."

The American dream paved the idea that every individual - through hard work and personal sacrifice could achieve success, by being their own boss on their own land. The American government earned this average; they encouraged the idea by giving out free land. But unfortunately the Wall Street Crash occurred the dream in 1929. The U.S entered a period of economic depression, and during this period thousands of migrant workers came to California in search of work, the dream on their minds. Most of these migrants were men who married alone; they had no friends or family around. They moved their minds to search working for a short time as each could able to settle. They worked very hard in poor conditions for poor pay, therefore migrant workers had no dream of a better future in order to survive. Without dreams no one would have a reason to keep going.

Steinbeck's main aim is to show the reality of a migrant's life and the reality of achieving their dream.
