13 Political public relations

Abstract: This chapter reflects on political public relations. It first characterizes political public relations as a central component of political communication by political actors. Moreover, the chapter argues that political public relations are not only about communication and involve a wider group of stakeholders such as lobby groups, think tanks, and party donors. The chapter then gives an overview of the literature on political public relations and defines it by suggesting a continuum of stakeholder engagement. Furthermore, several domains of political public relations are discussed in detail, i.e. news management and agenda building, issues management, event management, crisis management, assessment in political public relations, and digital communication. Finally, the authors call for a more systematic application of public relations theories and concepts that have seldom or never been applied in the context of political public relations.

Key Words: political public relations, political stakeholders, news management, agenda building, issues management, event management, crisis management, digital communication

1 Introduction

The significant role of public relations in the political process has been ubiquitous throughout history. From Ancient Greece and Rome to the American Revolution, scholars have documented the importance of public relations and communication in politics and democracy (Broom 2009; McKinnon, Tedesco, and Lauder 2001; Wilcox and Cameron 2007). Political public relations is practiced by a variety of political professionals, including but not limited to press secretaries, speech writers, campaign fund raisers, event managers, and political marketing and campaign consultants to name a few. Despite its pervasive impact, our theoretical and empirical understanding of political public relations has, however, lagged behind in comparison to other areas of political communication, public relations, and political science research. To remedy this, the purpose of this chapter is to provide an overview of political public relations research and encourage its growth as a field of study.

In comparing the concepts of political public relations and political communication, on the one hand political communication is a broader concept, highlighting "the exchange of symbols and messages between political actors and institutions, the general public, and the news media that are products of or have consequences for the political system" (McLeod, Kosicki, and McLeod 2002: 217).
